has quietly tried to change almost every aspect of life in Britain. That organisation is the Royal Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce, often known simply as the Royal Society of Arts. It has acted as Britain's private national improvement agency, in every way imaginable - essentially, a society for the improvement of everything and anything. This book is its history. From its beginnings in a coffee house in the mid-eighteenth century, the Society has tried to change Britain’s art, industry, laws, music, environment, education, and even culture. It has sometimes even succeeded. It has been a prize-fund for innovations, a platform for Victorian utilitarian reformers, a convenor of disparate interest groups, and the focal point for social movements. There has never been an organisation quite like it, constantly having to reinvent itself to find something new to improve. The book rewrites many of the old official histories of the Society and updates them to the present day, incorporating over half a century of further research into the periods they covered, along with new insights into the organisation’s evolution. The book reveals the hidden and often surprising history of how a few public-spirited people tried to make their country better, offering lessons from their triumphs and their failures for all would-be reformers today. When Connor Hall was young, he floated through life doing exactly what he was told to do in the upper middle class. He worked hard; he got good grades; he went to a good college. But less than a year away from earning his law degree, he realized he didn't want it. Now, he's in a relationship he isn't sure about and working a job that has no future, while worrying about how far he's lagging behind his friends and family. Jack of All Trades traces Connor's attempt to figure out what comes next, asking the question "do we settle for what we're supposed to do, or do we keep searching for what we truly want?"
